

Human Rights Services for Seafood Businesses

Reports of ethical concerns about human and labor rights issues in seafood supply chains are increasing. Given the complexity of seafood supply chains, companies must work with government and civil society for the shared goal of eliminating forced labor.

The time has come for companies to take further responsibility for both the environmental and social elements of sustainability in their seafood supply chains. This can reduce the risk of negative attention and also provide opportunities to improve brand value with consumers as documented human rights abuses continue to grab headlines. Actively supporting and upholding human rights allows companies to help address these important global issues.

FishWise Can Help

We can help navigate the complex and sensitive nature of human rights issues while focusing on solutions for your supply chains.

We can report on industry, government, and civil society efforts, initiatives, and progress to improve human rights in supply chains.

We can conduct human rights risk assessments to identify products that are likely to be from high risk countries and supply chains.

We can recommend a due diligence plan to improve human rights within supply chains and identify initial steps for engaging supply chains.

We can conduct a best practice assessment to benchmark company labor and human rights procedures against industry best practices and recommend areas for improvement and engagement.

We can help draft a business/supplier code of conduct and/or supplier expectations document.

Many of these services can occur in conjunction with our traceability services. Please visit our website for information on traceability services: fishwise.org/traceability
